Rationale	Children and young people experience a series of profound changes: they must contend with the physical changes of puberty, with more complex cognitive abilities, with a new focus on the centrality of friendship and other peer relationships, with the beginnings of the search for self, and with a growing questioning of who they are, who God is, and where they stand in relation to various philosophical positions. Literature written for these age groups is of the utmost importance in assisting children and adolescents to navigate the challenges that accompany their development, increasing their understanding of who they are and the world in which they live.  Through the processes of reading, creative writing, and class discussion, students will develop a deeper understanding of the literary genres available to children and young adults, and to appreciate how younger people learn through the reading of literature. This unit will provide opportunities for students to evaluate the literary merit of children's, adolescent and young adult literature, which has customarily been marginalised in terms of the Western literary canon, and to situate them in their historical, cultural, and gender contexts. Students will also examine the relevance of a variety of issues to the reading and teaching of such literature, such as: theory and practice, literacy, literary criticism, and the relation of adolescent and young adult literature to 'classic' literature.
